

KING IN RICHMOND

SUMMER 1953
VIRGINIA UNION UNIVERSITY

In an early visit to Virginia, Dr. King attended and spoke at an interseminary conference at Virginia Union University. King, who was then pursuing a doctorate in systematic theology from Boston University, stayed the night in a Virginia Union dormitory guest room. A friend later wrote to King of the “lasting effect” of his two sermons during the visit.

It was at Virginia Union during this time that Dr. King met his friend Wyatt Tee Walker, who would eventually become his chief of staff and lead the Southern Christian Leadership Conference as its first full-time executive director, shaping the course of historic civil rights campaigns.

Dr. King addressed a crowd of 2,600 at what was then the Mosque Theater, now Altria Theater, during the Pilgrimage of Prayer rally, urging Governor Almond to open Prince Edward county schools, which were illegally closed and remained so until 1964 in defiance of the Brown v. Board of Education desegregation ruling. The rally culminated in a march on Virginia’s State Capitol. King had endorsed but not attended the same rally held the previous year, creating an audio recording for the rally and writing in his endorsement, “Virginia, in this critical hour, has the opportunity to give direction and destiny to our troubled South. As Virginia goes, so goes the South, perhaps America, and the world.”
